Anchorage, Alaska, November 7, 2019 - Veterans Day is November 11, 2019. According to Justice For Vets (a national organization advocating for veterans in the criminal justice system), there are over 350 veterans treatment courts in operation in the United States. These courts provide justice-involved veterans with the structure, accountability, treatment and mentoring needed to repair their lives. By keeping veterans out of jail and prison, veterans treatment courts save their lives, families and futures, all while reducing costs to taxpayers.

The Anchorage Veterans Court process honors and respects veterans' service to our country. Established in 2004, the program has served more than 350 veterans. The Anchorage Veterans Court accepts veterans who have criminal charges and are eligible for VA benefits. The Court collaborates closely with the Veterans Administration to identify eligible candidates and monitor their progress through the program. The VA provides treatment services including substance use, mental health, and cognitive behavioral therapy.

A recent lookback showed that 65% of all participants exiting the court had no new criminal convictions up to five years after leaving. And 85% of those graduating from the court have remained crime-free and out of prison, contributing to a safer community and lowering criminal justice system costs.

Judge David Wallace, who has presided over Anchorage Veterans Court since 2010, stated that: "We do not judge who you are, where you have been, or what you have done. We are here to help those who have served our country and want help. The Veterans Court can change your life for the better. If you are a veteran charged with a criminal offense, and need substance abuse, mental health or other treatment that hasn't been addressed, please talk to your attorney about the Veterans Court."

The Anchorage Veterans Court invites the media and members of the public to observe the court in action to learn more about how it operates and promotes veterans' safe and sober return to the community.
